Neo-Arabic literature is only to a limited extent the heir of the old "classical" literature, and even shows a tendency to repudiate its inheritance entirely. Its leaders are for the most part men who have drunk from other springs and look at the world with different eyes. Yet the past still plays a part in their intellectual background, and there is a section among them upon whom the past ...

This chapter focusses on the most understudied area of Arabic literature, namely popular poetry of the post-classical period. Most important in the case of Arabic, the linguistic register of the works might be used as the primary means of identifying popular texts. In fact, no single criterion among these can be relied on to the exclusion of all others, and linguistic register, subject matter ...
